Last Wednesday morning the Baldwin Bros. went out to go to work on a building in the center of town, which they were putting up for a neighbor. When they got to the house, where they had left their tools,—consisting of three or four saws, some planes, hammers, chisels, etc., not a hatchet, hammer, saw, or any other tool of iron was to be found. And to this day no man but the thief who stole them knows the place wherein they are concealed. Every tool has the name of its owner stamped in the iron, and it is hoped this fact may yet lead to the detection of the scoundrel who stole them.
